TWO BROKERS

A Visual Storyboard

Nine Scenes. Two Brokers. One Client.

The story of how the moments between the milestones decide everything.

SCENE 1

Frank Walks to His Car, Unaware

The opening frame. The deal is already lost. He does not know it yet.

SETTING

Golden hour, a Dubai villa community. Frank — mid-40s, well-dressed, briefcase in hand — walks away from a property viewing toward his car. He looks calm. Satisfied. He has no idea he has already lost the deal.

NARRATION

> "Frank had a good day. He did everything right. He replied on time. He showed up prepared. He knew the market cold. By any measure that matters to a broker, Frank was having a successful day."

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

This shot opens and closes the film. It is the frame that turns every subsequent scene into a countdown the audience watches with dramatic knowledge Frank does not have. Hold on him. Let the audience sit with the uncomfortable truth that competence alone is not enough.

SCENE 2

James Sends the Same Enquiry

Two brokers. One message. The divergence begins.

SETTING

Evening, a modern Dubai apartment. James — a father of five, early 40s — sits on his couch, phone in hand. He sends the same WhatsApp enquiry about a villa to two brokers: Frank and Gena. Same message. Same listing. Same moment.

NARRATION

> "James is buying a villa. He doesn't know much about brokers. He knows he wants someone who will take care of him. So he sends the same message to two people, and he waits to see who shows up first."

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The split screen is deliberate — two identical messages, two different outcomes. The audience does not yet know which broker will win. They are about to find out that the winner is decided not by the big moments, but by the intervals between them.

SCENE 3

Frank Replies Within Fifteen Minutes

A good broker doing good work. Nothing to fault.

SETTING

A bright, modern Dubai office. Frank sits at his desk, reviewing property details on a tablet. Market data glows on the monitor behind him. He looks focused, competent, prepared. He replies to James within fifteen minutes — confirms the viewing, walks through the numbers with total confidence.

NARRATION

> "Frank replied within fifteen minutes. That is not slow. That is a good broker responding on a busy day. He confirmed the viewing. He showed up with the numbers. He knew the market cold. There was nothing to fault in Frank's work — and the audience needs to believe that, or the film does not land."

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

Frank's scenes carry warm narration because the story only works if the audience likes Frank and believes he did nothing wrong. He is not the villain. He is the portrait of a good broker without a system. His competence is real. His gap is invisible — to him.

SCENE 4

Gena Replies in Fifty Seconds

No narration. Her actions speak for themselves.

SETTING

A modern Dubai office with floor-to-ceiling windows. Gena — early 30s, sharp, calm — holds her phone. The screen glows. She has just sent her reply. Fifty seconds. A calendar invite follows immediately.

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

Gena's key scenes have no narration. Her actions are left to speak for themselves, back to back, until the pattern becomes self-evident: she is always one step ahead, without ever being told to be. The silence is the point. The audience does not need to be told that fifty seconds is faster than fifteen minutes. They feel it. The calendar invite is the second beat — not just a reply, but an action. She did not just respond. She organized.

SCENE 5

The Property File Lands in Three Minutes

Anticipation of the next question. The thesis begins to land.

SETTING

James, still on his couch, looks at his phone. A property file has arrived — photos, floor plan, comparable sales. He did not ask for it. He asked one question: "Is this available?" He received a full information pack before he could type a follow-up.

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The pattern is building. The audience is watching Gena operate in the intervals — the spaces Frank does not think to fill because, from where he stands, they do not look like moments. This is the scene where the audience starts to understand the thesis. The property file is not a response to a question. It is an anticipation of the next question. That distinction is the entire film.

SCENE 6

Branded Cost Breakdown at the Viewing

An artifact, not a conversation.

SETTING

A luxury Dubai villa interior. Bright natural light. Gena stands across from James, handing him a branded folder — a printed cost breakdown document. Clean design, charts, transparent numbers. James takes it. This is not a phone calculator or a verbal walk-through. This is an artifact.

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

The audience has now seen four consecutive moments where Gena was ahead. No narration is needed. The pattern is self-evident. The branded document is a visual anchor — it signals that Gena operates at a different standard. Frank walked James through the numbers verbally, with confidence. Gena handed James something he could take home, show his wife, and compare. The information is the same. The delivery is different. That difference is the film.

SCENE 7

The Vendor List, Ready Before It's Asked For

The scene that wins the deal.

SETTING

The villa living room. James's wife is present. She raises a concern about the move — fit-out, logistics, the disruption to family life. Gena does not hesitate. She does not say "let me get back to you on that." She pulls out her phone and shows a curated list of vendors. Ready. Before the concern was raised.

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

This is the most important scene in the film. It is the moment the client's decision is made — though he will not articulate it until the next scene. The wife's expression matters: she looks relieved, impressed, cared for. Gena's expression is calm, warm, unsurprised. She was not improvising. She had already been there. The vendor list says something the other moments do not: I was thinking about your life, not just your transaction.

SCENE 8

James Chooses Gena

Not a feature comparison. A feeling.

SETTING

A warm, upscale Dubai cafe. James sits across from his friend Mike. Coffee on the table. James is relaxed, reflective. He is explaining his decision — not with features, not with a comparison, but with a feeling.

NARRATION

> "Frank had done the right job. There was nothing wrong with it. I just felt more taken care of with Gena."

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

This is the only scene where James speaks directly about his decision. Keep it simple. The line is the thesis of the entire film: the client's decision was not made at the big milestones. It was made in the small, easy-to-miss intervals between them. "I just felt more taken care of" is not a feature comparison. It is a feeling — built from the accumulation of moments where Gena was already ahead.

SCENE 9

Frank Walks to His Car — The Final Shot

The same shot. Now understood.

SETTING

The same shot as Scene 1. Golden hour. Frank walks toward his car. He looks calm. Satisfied. He has no idea.

NARRATION

> "Sometimes the difference isn't the property. And it isn't whether the broker can do the job. It's what the client experiences between one step and the next."

DIRECTOR'S NOTE

Return to the opening shot — identical framing, identical composition. But now the audience understands what they are looking at. They are not watching a service comparison. They are watching the exact thing we want every client to feel about us, and the exact thing we don't want a single one of our competitors' clients to feel about them. Frank did nothing wrong. He simply never saw the moments that mattered, because from where he stood, they didn't look like moments at all. Hold on black. Title card: TWO BROKERS.

“Sometimes the difference isn’t the property. And it isn’t whether the broker can do the job. It’s what the client experiences between one step and the next.”

TWO BROKERS

A film about the moments that decide everything.
